Who is an American Indian?

Generally, an American Indian is a person who has Indian ancestry and is recognized as an Indian by a tribe and/or the United States. Each tribe establishes its own rules for tribal membership. While many people claim some American Indian ancestry, this alone does not make them Indian in the eyes of tribes or state or federal governments. Continued family, social, and community connections and knowledge of tribal history are examples of criteria used by tribes to determine cultural identity.

What's an Indian tribe?

Members of a tribe usually live in or around a defined territory, and in many cases speak a common language or dialect.

What's a powwow?

Powwow comes from a Narragansett word that referred to curing ceremonies. It has come to mean a celebration and social gathering that honors Indian traditions through dancing, drumming, and singing. Although powwows may be held to honor an individual or to mark a special occasion, they are usually social events, often with drumming and dancing competitions.

What's an "Indian stereotype"?

Inauthentic, unrealistic, and offensive images of Indians have been used to sell everything from butter to tobacco to cars, and have served—and continue to serve—as mascots for sports teams. Despite efforts to correct or end the use of stereotypes, distorted imagery and misinformation about Native peoples are common. Stereotypes are often the result of oversimplifications of real traditions and lifeways.
