Press Advisory: New Historical Fashion Exhibit Opens at North Carolina Museum of History

RALEIGH, N.C. – A new exhibit is coming to the lobby of the North Carolina Museum of History on Friday, September 22, 2017.

The N.C. Museum of History presents The Shape of Fashion, a new exhibit showcasing 10 different fashionable silhouettes (six represented by artifacts) that show changing trends of dress from the 1800s to the 1900s. The exhibition will be available through May 6, 2018.

The clothing chosen for this exhibit comes from the museum's extensive collection of textiles and features ball gowns, afternoon dresses, and a few examples of men's and children's clothing, all conserved and mounted for display.

The shapes, or silhouettes, people have considered fashionable have changed significantly over time. The "looks" on display include everything from the "column" shape of the 1790s, which harkened back to Greek statues and the classical period, to the enormous "leg-o'-mutton sleeves" of the 1890s to the modern "sheath" look of the mid-1960s.

The exhibition opens in conjunction with another feast for the eyes: the small lobby-case exhibit Louis C. Tiffany: Art and Innovation from the Wester Collection. More details about upcoming exhibits can be found on the museum's website at ncmuseumofhistory.org.
