Alamance Battleground covers a 40-acre area of open fields and woods where, for two hours on May 16, 1771, the Regulators fought the militia under the command of William Tryon, royal governor of North Carolina. Recent additions to the site include a visitor center housing interpretive displays, a series of markers noting various aspects of the battle, and a large column with plaques commemorating the Regulators. This column was moved to the present site in 1963 from its original site at Guilford Courthouse National Military Park where it was erected in 1901. The John Allen House, a typical late eighteenth century dwelling once owned by the brother-in-law of a Regulator leader, Herman Husband, was restored and moved to the battleground in 1966.
Alamance Battleground is the site of the defeat of the Regulators by the North Carolina colonial militia under the command of Royal Governor William Tryon. This battle marked the climax of the Regulator movement which had disturbed the colony for several years.

The Regulators sought to challenge the malpractices of judges, sheriffs, and other office holders, which included extortionate fees required by local officials, unreasonable demands by tax collectors, and cases wherein much of the tax collected was kept by the official rather than being sent on to the government. The Regulators objected to the domination of the provincial government by the eastern planters. These grievances, it should be noted, were against specific misuses of power by the governing officials, not against the government itself. The Regulator leaders were, in fact, careful to pint out that they were in no way fighting for a change in the "Form or Mode of Government." Another complaint was the shortage of specie (hard money).

The Regulators at first tried to correct official corruption by legal and peaceful means. Led by such men as Herman Husband of Orange County and Thomas Person of Granville, the Regulators petitioned Governor Tryon, presented their grievances to the assembly, and stated their complaints in a series of "Regulator Advertisements." These efforts were not effective, and eventually dissatisfaction led to increasing outbreaks of lawlessness. Alarmed by the incidents of mob violence, the Assembly passed a riot act aimed against the Regulators. The Regulators responded with threats of wider violence; the governor in turn called out the militia to suppress the insurgents. On May 16, 1771, after brief and fruitless negotiations, Tryon's force of over 1,000 militia men attacked about 2,000 poorly-armed Regulators. Within two hours the government forces were victorious. Tryon lost nine men and had sixty-one wounded; nine Regulators were killed and an undetermined number wounded.

Immediately after the battle, one man was summarily hanged by Tryon's forces. Shortly thereafter twelve Regulators were tried and convicted of treason; six were hanged, six pardoned by the governor. A monument was erected in 1901 in memory of these men, naming "James Pugh, Robert Matear, Benjamin Merrill, Captain Messer, and two others whose names are now Unknown," and recalling the words of Pugh, who was reported to have said before he was hanged, "Our blood will be as good seed in good ground, that will soon produce one hundred fold."
Governor Tryon offered clemency to all Regulators who would take an oath of allegiance. Within six weeks over 6,000 had done so. After the battle and the utter defeat of the Regulator movement, some Regulators left North Carolina "in despair of seeing better times."

The Regulator movement was an expression of the growing pains of the young colony as settlement advanced westward. As with most of the large colonies whose expansion was in one direction, there was a mounting tension between the long-entrenched landowners of the established coastal areas and the small farmers of the Piedmont. Like the Regulator movement of South Carolina and Bacon's Rebellion in Virginia, the North Carolina Regulator movement reflected the social and economic differences between the tidewater and inland regions as well as the common resentment of malpractices by corrupt government officials and the shortage of specie. Thus Alamance Battleground was the scene of one of the conflicts which played an important role in the growth of the American colonies.
