The Robeson Plantation, known as Walnut Grove, located between the Cape Fear River and N.C. 87 just south of Tar Heel, includes a well-preserved Greek Revival house and an extensive collection of contemporary outbuildings: kitchen, dairy, smokehouse, barn, well, cold frame, and scalding vat. The two-story frame house, five bays wide and four bays deep, faces N.C. 87. The house rests on a brick pier foundation, is covered with plain siding, and is capped by a low hip roof from which rise two interior brick chimneys with molded caps. Three-bay double porches mark the main (south) and rear elevations.

The center bay entrances at both levels of the front and rear elevations are identical, each consisting of a single door with four flat panels, flanked by Doric pilasters, and framed by an irregularly paneled transom and three-pane sidelights set within a molded surround. Beneath the sidelight on each side is a panel. Six-over-six sash windows set within simple molded surrounds occur on each elevation. The main facade windows have louvered shutters. Heavy corner posts give visual support to the wide frieze and molded box cornice which continue around the main block. The front porch features at both levels octagonal Doric posts and a rounded rail with square balusters. The rear porch has square Doric posts, and only the upper level has a railing. A single flight of stairs with an identical railing and an octagonal chamfered newel leads from the lower to the upper porch level. This exterior stair is characteristic of early houses in the area. The northwest bay of the lower level of the rear porch has been enclosed. The main block eave treatment is repeated on both porches.

The dining room dependency, a one-story frame building, stands at the northeast rear corner of the house, connected by a breezeway identical in treatment to the rear porch. With the exception of the nine-over-nine sash, this dependency is identical in treatment to the main block.

The center-hall plan two rooms deep is unaltered except for the addition of a bathroom on each floor. The interior Greek Revival treatment of both floors consists of plastered wall and ceiling surfaces, doors containing four flat panels, simple molded architraves, a flat panel beneath each window, and simple, heavy mantels. The open-string stair rises in a single flight against the west wall of the wide hall to the second floor. A square tapering newel with a molded cap, plain balusters, and an oval handrail form the balustrade. A large plaster ceiling medallion is centered in the front half of the first floor hall. The stylized flower center is set within an abstract foliage border and concentric moldings. The hall walls at both levels contain a beaded board recessed into the plaster at eye level.

The mantel of the main parlor (southeast room) is a heavy composition consisting of paired Doric pilasters supporting a plain frieze and a molded cornice and shelf. The mantel of the dining room (northeast room) is similar but contains single Doric pilasters. The mantels in the west side rooms on the first floor have been removed. Lighter versions of the dining room mantel occur in each of the second-floor rooms.
The dining dependency contains its original two rooms, the dining room and the pantry, although the pantry has been extended to the east. The dining room has been converted to a kitchen. The dairy, a small square structure elevated on wooden stilts and capped by a pyramidal hip roof, is located directly behind the dining dependency. The east and west faces contain a small door, and the south face contains two louvered openings. The openings have molded surrounds and eave finish identical to the house. The original kitchen, located behind the house, is a one-story frame building with a gable roof, nine-over-six and six-over-four sash windows, and an east end exterior brick chimney. It contains two rooms with a corner enclosed stair leading on the loft. The interior is finished with horizontal sheathing, a plain chair rail, and has several six-panel doors, one hung on HL hinges.

The hip roof smokehouse, located behind the kitchen, is covered with wide flush horizontal sheathing, an unusual siding for this period and climate. Two vertical battens are attached with large nails to the sheathing of the west elevation, perhaps to anchor the siding more firmly. The large salting tubs, constructed of wooden staves, in which meat was preserved, still remain inside. Two barns form the rear boundary of the farm complex. One of the barns, which appears to be contemporary with the rest of the complex, is a saddle-notched log building with a gable-end facade and side frame lean-tos. Much hand-wrought iron hardware remains on these outbuildings. Other surviving remnants of antebellum plantation life include huge wooden gate posts with decorative round caps at the plantation entrance on N.C. 87, a large iron scalding vat which rests on a round brick base, a well, and a substantial brick cold frame located on the east side of the house.
Standing on land granted to the Robeson family in 1735 and owned by Revolutionary leader Thomas Robeson, Walnut Grove (built in the 1850s) consists of a handsome Greek Revival plantation house and a notable group of well-preserved contemporary outbuildings. Walnut Grove is unique among Bladen County's antebellum plantation houses in retaining its original context of a complete plantation complex; its significance is enhanced by the survival of Civil War letters documenting plantation life. Of interest in the evolution of southeastern North Carolina dwellings is the rare use of both exterior and interior stairs.

The land upon which the present Walnut Grove stands was granted to Thomas Robeson, Sr., in 1735. Robeson's father, Andrew Robeson, Jr., was a native of Scotland and a graduate of Oxford University. He arrived in America about 1690 and became active in public affairs, serving as chief justice of the province of Pennsylvania for a time.

Thomas Robeson is believed to have settled on the Cape Fear River sometime after his father's death about 1719. He was married to Sarah Singletary and was the father of two sons and a daughter. His early homestead on the south bank of the Cape Fear's northwest branch became known as Walnut Grove.

Robeson's oldest son Thomas Robeson, Jr., was born at his father's plantation on January 11, 1740. He served as one of Bladen County's delegates to the Third Provincial Congress, held at Hillsborough in 1775, and at Halifax's Fourth and Fifth Provincial Congresses of 1776. The following year he was elected as Bladen's first state senator.

During the Revolutionary War Robeson served as commanding colonel of the Bladen County militia. In August, 1781, a group of Tories under Colonel David Fanning raided a number of settlements along the Cape Fear. In his Narratives, written a number of years later, Fanning recorded that he "came to a plantation belonging to a Capt. Robertson /Capt. Peter Robeson, Thomas Robeson's brother, who resides nearby/—which I burned; From thence I marched to his brother's Col. /Thomas/ Robertson, which served in the same manner." Colonel Robeson took an active part in the Battle of Elizabethtown, in which victorious Whig forces virtually eliminated Tory influence in the Cape Fear region.

Colonel Robeson died May 2, 1785. In 1787 a new county was created from portions of old Bladen and was named Robeson in his honor. The homeplace tract apparently descended to Colonel Robeson's son William Robeson (1771-1825), then to William's son James Robeson, Jr. The latter is believed to have built the present Walnut Grove during the 1850s. (Family tradition states that a second house stood on or near the site of the present mansion; this is supported by an 1864 letter James Robeson's widow noting that the plantation's cows were being kept "below the old House"). The census of 1850 credits James Robeson with the ownership of 2,220 acres valued at $4,500; a decade later his landholdings had increased to 5,061 acres valued at $28,509. A list of Robeson's taxable property for 1860 includes—in addition to 3,265½ acres of land—twenty-four slaves, one piano, one carriage (valued at $150), one barouche (valued at $150), and two buggies (valued at $100 each).

By 1863 war had again involved the inhabitants of Walnut Grove. James Robeson's two oldest sons, James McKay ("Coy"), aged twenty-one, and Cad W., aged nineteen, enlisted in May of that year as privates in Company H, Thirty-Sixth Regiment North Carolina Troops. Letters from Walnut Grove to Coy Robeson before and after his enlistment provide an inkling of attitudes and conditions of the period.

In February, 1863, Coy's younger brother Cad wrote to inform him that we have Boiled about 65 Bu of Salt father says that will last him this year and next father is giving his Beaves to the /Confederate/ goverment he has Kild about 20 and has about 10 more he gets 15 cents a pound for them and saves the hides heads . . . and tales Some of them went 500 I don t Know exactly how many he has got to Kill But he says he thinks he will have about 200 home and /on/ howards Creek . . .

Fifteen months later Coy's mother Eliza Ann Robeson, now a forty-year-old widow (James Robeson, Jr., died February 3, 1864, at the age of fifty-three) in charge of four children ranging in age from four to sixteen, wrote to her son:

Emmie & Jimmy & Jeff have binn quite sick with bad colds and I do not feel very well my self . . . we have two many horses. I am shearing the sheep to day I have 31 old & 13 lambs at Home & 5 old & 6 lambs at Hammons Creek we have had

I want her to lern musick ... the p'le in this neighbourhood wont hire a teacher ... they would be vary willing for me to hire a teacher but I will teach Jimmy and send Emmie off

my envelops are nerly gon

Census data suggest that Eliza Ann Robeson continued to reside at Walnut Grove until her death on October 5, 1891. The property apparently then descended to seven principal heirs and remained under multiple ownership until the early 1920s. In December, 1922, William W. Robeson and his sister Mary E. Myers, pleading a desire "to have the home place," brought suit in Bladen County Superior Court to have the old James Robeson tract divided and valuated for sale. The following year they were awarded "Share No. 1-2," amounting to 351 acres, including the mansion house. This tract was valued by court-appointed commissioners at $15,000. Three months later William W. Robeson and Mary E. Myers conveyed a one-third undivided interest in Walnut Grove to Mrs. Myers's husband Patrick Henry Myers. The house is presently owned by Mr. and Mrs. Myers's daughter Sarah Myers Averitt.
