This form is a nomination for the National Register of Historic Places, detailing the location, classification, and ownership of the Barracks in Tarboro, North Carolina. It includes sections for the owner's information, legal description, and representation in existing surveys.
The Barracks is one of a group of buildings in North Carolina designed by William Percival, a retired British army officer who practiced architecture in Virginia and North Carolina. Percival's very personal style is best seen in this house, and in Montfort Hall, Raleigh. These buildings exhibit a formalized version of the proportion and massing common to the Italian Villa style combined with an overlay of Greek Revival and Italianate detail. On the other hand, his Gothic Revival First Baptist Church in Raleigh and Renaissance Revival New East and New West halls at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, show that Percival could design within a more orthodox idiom should the occasion arise.

The Barracks is built of salmon colored brick laid in mechanical bond. Its main (east) facade is dominated by a central projecting bay with a distyle pedimented portico. The fluted columns take their order from the Tower of the Winds, Athens. They support a heavy entablature which is carried around the whole building. The frieze is punctuated by elaborate brackets grouped in pairs. Centered in the spaces between the paired brackets are circular vents with decorative grates flanked by single panels. Under the portico is the main doorway framed by an elliptical arch of projecting unmoulded brick. The space within the arch is divided into three bays by engaged columns. The large center bay contains double doors surmounted by a semicircular stained glass fanlight. Each door has a long vertical panel with semicircular ends. The narrow flanking bays contain semicircular headed side lights of stained glass. Above the doorway is a balcony which rests on heavy wooden brackets and features a delicate iron balustrade. Access to the balcony is through a pair of floor-length windows united by an unmoulded projecting brick casing and a shallow segmental cornice hood.

The single flanking bays feature one-story loggias with coupled columns of the same order as the portico. There are pairs of windows on each level. Those on the second floor have brick casings similar to those under the portico. They are sheltered by flat cornices, and rest on projecting brownstone sills supported by simple moulded brackets. Beneath the loggias are pairs of floor length windows resting on the brownstone stringer which delineates the top of the water table.

On the north side of the house is an ornate iron balcony with an unusual splayed roof.

At the rear of the house are several additions, some made soon after the house was built and others at a later date.

The main doorway leads into a rectangular foyer. At either end are doors opening on the two loggias. Behind the foyer is a circular rotunda. At the second floor level there is a circular gallery; otherwise the view to the stained glass window under the cupola at the top of the rotunda is unobstructed. On both floors of the rotunda there are four axial doors. Between the doors are unadorned round-headed niches, semicircular in plan.
The south door of the rotunda leads to the front parlor. Behind this is a larger parlor with an unusual bay window featuring a pair of fluted Corinthian columns in antis. The north rotunda door opens on a library with two trabeated bookcases featuring unique open work grills. Behind the library is the dining room which has a bay window similar to the one in the large parlor. The west door of the rotunda gives access to the stair hall.

The Barracks retains most of its original interiors including louvered interior shutters, heavy moulded plaster cornices, coved ceilings, marble mantels, and very ornate gas chandeliers which have been electrified. Several of the rooms have superb parquet floors. On the second floor one of the bathrooms contains its original tub, marble sink top, and tongue-and-groove wainscot.
In 1858 William S. Battle contracted William Percival of Petersburg, Virginia, to design a house on the plantation inherited by his wife, Elizabeth, from her father Francis L. Dancy. Battle, a member of one of the most prominent families in North Carolina, owned the extensive Rocky Mount Cotton Mills and represented Edgecombe County at the North Carolina Secession Convention in 1861. His mills were burned by Union soldiers in 1863 and the costs of rebuilding left him deeply in debt. On April 13, 1883, Battle transferred his home, The Barracks, to William Howard, in trust, to cover his debts. The Battles finally sold the house in 1900 to Reuben Foster. George Howard III bought the property soon afterward and resided in The Barracks until about 1950. The house is presently owned by Francis P. Jenkins of Tarboro.

The Barracks is one of the most interesting examples of the work of William Percival, a gifted but little known architect of the period. It is one of the most sumptuous and best preserved mansions of its date in North Carolina.
