DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Built in 1910 to replace a ca 1884 family home destroyed by fire the previous year, this Colonial Revival house was built for John Winifield Scot Robinson, one of Ivanhoe's wealthiest and most prominent citizens. The current owner and occupant, Robinson's daughter, does not remember the name of the contractor. However, she does recall that he was dismissed before the house was completed because all the windows were of a different size; the job was finished by local contractors. Robinson, a member of an old Ivanhoe Scottish family, served as the 1885 Sampson County representative to the General Assembly. He operated a general store and post office at his landing on the Black River, Delta Landing, from which the name of the plantation, Delta, was taken. Robinson was also a large farmer, making annual cattle drives to Wilmington and he ran a sizeable naval store operation. Large and spacious, located in a grove of trees down a private lane, the two-story, double-pile house has a front wrap-around porch and is notable for its excellent interior woodwork. Especially significant are the large - four feet wide - folding doors leading to the dining room. The handsome house is indicative of the fine quality of wood and workmanship available to the planter class in the early 20th century; it is historically tied to the development of steamboat travel on the Black River and with the old, pioneering Highland Scot families of Ivanhoe.

The five-bay-by-four-bay, two-story, double-pile frame house rests on brick piers and is sheltered by a standing seam metal hip roof. A single false gable marks the center of the roof. Substantial interior common bond brick chimneys with corbeled capitals rise from the roof. Across the front, or eastern facade, extends a screened porch carried by Tuscan columns and connected with a slender turned baluster railing. Covered with a hipped roof, the porch curves at the southeast and wraps along the southern elevation for two bays. Fenestration is two-over-two with flat surrounds and louvered shutters. A three-window bay on the north wall of the front northeast parlor has molded upper and lower panels. At the northwest extends a two-room rear ell, connected to the main house with a continuation porch along the ell's south elevation.

Upon entering through the ornate door with a large glass window, one is immediately struck by the spaciousness of the interior. Rising from the front of the hall, along the south wall, is a handsome staircase with turned balusters on a closed stringer terminating at an oversized, turned newel: the gentle angle of ascent makes climbing unusually comfortable and natural. The walls are plastered. The interior woodwork is all stained dark, which tends to lessen the size of the hall and rooms. Ceilings throughout the house are of similar sheathing, simply laid. Mantels, overmantels and other interior woodwork are of the Colonial Revival nature seen in other early 20th century rural houses. Baseboards are used throughout the first floor with the exception of the hall, which has a tongue-and-groove sheathed wainscot, and the front northeast parlor, which has a low, paneled wainscot. From this parlor, north of the interior chimney, is an unusually wide - 3½ feet - door of six, raised, horizontal panels leading to the rear parlor. From this rear parlor, which also has an overmantel, two unusually bi-fold doors give access to the large dining room. The two doors each consist of two sections hinged so as to fold against the frame. Approximately seven feet tall, the two halves are each comprised of two unequal sized sections, having five horizontal panels. When fully opened, this doorway spans twelve feet. The rear kitchen, with an engaged pantry that terminates the rear porch, has a handsome wooden Easklake mantel.

From the rear of the back porch rises a service stairs to the upstairs. The upstairs hall has a wainscot similar to the downstairs; the four bedrooms have neither wainscot nor baseboard. Upstairs mantels are simple and of local classical detailing.

Included on the house site are a number of the original frame outbuildings. Surviving are the gas house - where gas was manufactured for use in the lamps, the two-room servants-ironing house, two smokehouses, a trumpery house for storage, the root cellar, the remnants of the washhouse, and a former brick flower pit. Only two of the many cribs, stables and barns necessary for a farm this size survive. Included in the 444 acre farm - the same land given Robinson by his father in 1880 - is approximately 3,000 feet of frontage along the Black River, including the site of the former store at Delta Landing. Much of the acreage is still covered with mixed pine - hardwood forests.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Situated in a grove of oaks and surrounded by the surviving outbuildings of the extensive farmstead, this large, Colonial Revival house - noted for its spacious interior and the excellent woodwork - was the home of one of the area's wealthiest planters and merchants in the early 1900s. Built in 1910 to replace the previous ca 1884 house which burned in 1909, the house was the seat of the extensive farming and mercantile business of John Winifield Scott Robinson (1848-1927). Robinson, a descendent of the area's prominent settling Highland Scot families, at the time he built this house, was farming four farms in three counties and operated a general store and post office at Delta Landing, his private river boat landing on the Black River, from which the plantation's name is derived. The county's 1885 representative and 1899 senator to the state legislature in Raleigh, Robinson was prominent in local affairs and a leader in the Black River Presbyterian Church. The house and the 444 acres given him by his father, Daniel Robinson (1817-1897), in 1880, is owned and occupied by his daughter.

CRITERIA ASSESSMENT

- A. The J. W. Scott Robinson House and Farm are important examples in the rural plantation economy and agricultural development at the turn of the century. In an area where naval stores were an important industry since the 1760s, the Robinson Farm was one of the last in the county to be a major producer.
- B. This was the home of John Winifield Scott Robinson (1848-1927), the descendent of some of Ivanhoe's earliest and most prominent Highland Scot families. Proprietor of a general store, operator of the post office and owner of his private river boat landing at Delta Landing on the Black River, Robinson was an important force in the economic, political, social, and religious life of the community.
- C. Built in the popular Colonial Revival style, the large, two-story, 1910 house is an outstanding example of the quality of workmanship and the grace of upper-class farm life in the 1910s. Especially notable is the interior's woodwork, including the massive bi-fold doors leading to the dining room.
- D. Is very likely to yield information about late 19th-early 20th century agrarian life.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The John Winfield Scott Robinson house is located in the extreme southern part of Sampson County, near the community of Ivanhoe and adjacent to the Black River. The impressive Colonial Revival house was constructed about 1910 to replace a recently-burned 1884 house. Scott Robinson was one of the county's leading businessmen and farmers.

The Robinson family was one of a number of Scotch families to move to Sampson County (then New Hanover County) in the 1770s. William and Catherine Robinson settled near present-day Ivanhoe in 1771, along with their infant son Duncan, Scott Robinson's grandfather. The Robinson's quickly become one of the area's leading families. Scott Robinson was born in 1848, the son of Daniel Robinson (1817-1897) and Hannah Caroline Lamb Robinson. He married Mary Jeanette Corbett (1865-1962).

Scott Robinson was a county leader in a number of areas. However, he was probably best known as a businessman. He operated a number of general stores, a private river boat landing on the Black River, a grist mill, a cotton gin and press, a copper shop, blacksmith shops, and turpentine stills. He also farmed a number of tracts in Sampson and surrounding counties. In 1891, he owned 696 acres in Franklin township alone. Robinson served as postmaster for the community of Delta for ten years and for Ivanhoe for four years. He represented Sampson County as a state representative in 1885 and as a state senator in 1899. An active member of the Black River Presbyterian Church, he was widely known for his philanthropy. He built a one-room school in Ivanhoe in 1897 and was an active supporter of education in the county.² At his death in 1927, Governor Angus McLean eulogized him as "one of the most useful and constructive citizens of the state."³

The Robinsons had six children: Mary Jeanette, John Daniel, Laura, Frances, Caroline, and Winfield. Nettie Robinson continued to live at the house until her death in 1962. Winfield Robinson (1899-1954) inherited the property from his father. He never married so that at his death the house and land became the property of his four sisters.⁴

The Scott Robinson house, also known as Delta farm due to its proximity to Robinson's Black River boat landing, has considerable local historical significance. Robinson was one of the most important people in southern Sampson County during the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, with contributions in business, agriculture, politics, and other fields. The importance of the house is increased by the large number of outbuildings surviving.

BOUNDARY JUSTIFICATION:

The house is being nominated along with 444 acres which have been associated with the house since it was built in 1910, and before that was associated with the Robinson family and an earlier house, as well as farming, milling, ginning, turpentine and riverboating operations. The Delta Landing was a private landing on the Black River operated by Robinson during the late nineteenth century, and the site of that landing is on the property being nominated, as are sites of the other enterprises in which he was engaged. A large number of outbuildings also still stand on the property. The acreage being nominated is significant for the standing structures on it, the sites which are known, and will preserve the riverbanks and adjoining fields and woodlands, giving a realistic setting to the house.
